Green Development

Editors' and Readers' Choice: Maytag Mountain Ranch: Envisioned by longtime cattle rancher Russ Maytag, this ranch is a one-of-a-kind venture in sustainability, where 27 100-acre homesteads will form a unique community on a working cattle ranch at the foot of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains. Maytag insists on eco-friendly design guidelines—including square footage restrictions, home-site designation to protect view corridors and native plant specifications—but many buyers have decided to take it a step further, building geothermal-heated and LEED-certified homes on the property. With a deep reverence for the land and the green life, the ethic of Maytag Mountain Ranch shows that agriculture and development can coexist. MaytagMountainRanch.com

Green Builder

Readers' Choice: Meadow Mountain Homes

After a number of years in the high-end building industry, Sean and Ingrid McGinley decided to start their own venture, Meadow Mountain Homes, in hopes of creating luxury homes that are in good taste both aesthetically and environmentally. With eco-sensitive homes in Edwards' Cordillera development and others awaiting Built-Green certification, this husband and wife team aims to educate everyone involved in the building process on how to go green with style. Editors' Choice: McStain Neighborhoods

McStain Neighborhoods' tagline, "we're on a mission here," rang true when we considered their impact on the last 40 years of building on the Front Range. As a founding member of Built Green Colorado and one of the state's few builders with 100-percent commitment to following the EPA's ENERGY STAR standards, McStain's green resume is impressive.
